

NETFLIX BEGINNERS GUIDE

Every day brings new stories, new issues, new problems. Just turn on the TV or open social media and you'll see something new unfolding. This cycle can bring to light impactful issues and troubling problems that demand resolution. These issues affect all of us yet somehow, they slip out of sight—forgotten. Our media ecosystem has adapted to thrive on attention and because of this, unresolved issues go unseen and movements go unfinished; fighting in the quiet peripheral of our attention span.

This has to change.

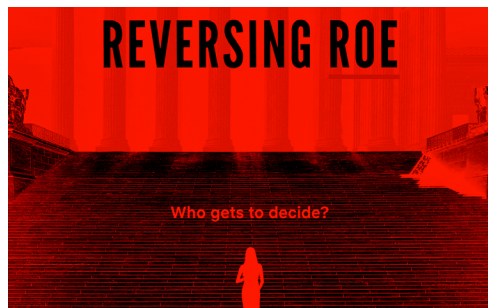

Brave individuals fight every day for their lives, their rights, and our planet only to be rewarded with ignorance and inaction. This Guide is can be the first step in reigniting the forgotten conversations; find documentaries to help you find a cause that speaks to you and give you the tools you need to speak up. Just watching is never enough, information must lead to action if things are ever going to get better.

Just because you stopped watching, doesn't mean that issues disappeared.

It's time to change.

Racism in America goes back to the beginning and is directly intertwined with its history. Some people are under the impression that racism is a thing of the past. Not only is it more prevalent than ever, but the racist policies created over the decades still actively harm the black community.

Feminists: What Were They Thinking?

Take a look back on the 70's feminist movement, its causes, and all that it has done for us today. Feminism is looked down on by many who take for granted daily aspects of life that only exist because of the first and second waves of feminism.

Hollywood's representation of Transgender issues often hurts the community more than it helps. Learn how trans history and the history of film are interconnected while dispelling hurtful stereotypes and stigmas.

CLIMATE CHANGE

2040: Regenerative Agriculture

We always hear the children are the future, but little has been done to protect the future for our children. Right now, in the world there are incredible ways of reducing the impact of climate change, the only reason why they're not implemented is society's and corporations' unwillingness to adapt.

Cowspriracy

One of the greatest factors that adds to climate change is livestock and factory farming, but this problem has gone ignored by environmental groups. There's more to that goes into our food than we ever realized, and to make changes, we have to be informed.

A life on Our planet with David Attenborough

David Attenborough looks back on his life, how the world has changed, and our relationship with nature. Climate change is the greatest threat to human existence that we face, but because it's so intangible, we ignore it—pushing ourselves closer to collapse.

The Social Dilemma

Social media isn't as objective as you think. Listen to the creators behind Google, Facebook, and YouTube as they explain the real purpose of the sites. Connectivity isn't the product they're selling, we are—and they'll do anything to keep viewers engaged, even spread lies.

Cuba and the Cameraman

A filmmaker documents the history of Cuba over the course of 45 years through the lives of three families. It's easy to adopt an Us vs. Them mentality with countries whose ideologies oppose our own. When we look at the people, their history, and difficulties, we can see that we have more in common than we thought.

The Square

Join people on the street as the 2011 Egyptian revolution occurs, leading to the collapse of two governments. The news portrays social uprising as objective facts of far-off places. Seeing the injustices firsthand and the power of people coming together makes the story come to life, inspiring more change.

Crip camp

What started as a small summer camp where kids with disabilities could come together and feel normal turned into a revolution, blazing a path towards greater equality. When demanding social change, those with disabilities are often always overlooked; equality should have no prejudice.
